

I created yap out of a very personal habit: sending extremely long voice memos to my friends. I've always preferred yapping over texting. There's something about hearing people's actual voices that feels far more human than reading messages off a screen. As life gets busier and harder to coordinate around phone calls, voice notes slowly became my default way of staying connected to the people closest to me.

Over time, I became notoriously known for sending five-, 10-, sometimes even 15-minute-long voice memos. And while I genuinely loved receiving the same from my friends, I started noticing the same friction come up repeatedly. People didn't always have 10 uninterrupted minutes to sit through an entire memo at once. If they stopped halfway to respond to something, they'd lose where they left off. If they waited until the end, they'd forget half the things they wanted to reply to. Conversations became difficult to navigate, specific moments got buried, and replying often meant scrubbing back and forth trying to find one specific part again.

That tension became the starting point for yap: a voice-first messaging platform designed around how conversations actually happen in real life. Instead of treating every voice memo as one long linear recording, yap uses AI to understand conversational context, organize discussions by topic, and thread responses directly into the parts people are actually replying to. Users can still listen straight through like a normal voice memo, or jump between conversations, updates, and side tangents depending on what they have time for in the moment.

yap explores a middle ground between texting and phone calls, designing a way to make asynchronous communication feel more human, more personal, and easier to keep up with in the middle of real life. Or, as I like to put it: designed for friends who yap all day.

yap.

Less texting. More yapping.

This is still an early beta, so you may run into the occasional glitch, bug, or broken moment along the way. I'd genuinely love any feedback, thoughts, or reactions as you try it out. Feel free to start a chat with me (Sooim) on yap and leave a voice memo, or if you're feeling old school, scribble down a few notes instead. Thank you so much!

Try it out yourself by sending a voice memo in a new or existing chat.

Or better yet, if you're feeling especially yappy, sign up at joinyap.chat and start yapping with your friends.

Existing yappers

Sooim (Me)	+1913-708-2840
Mel	+1647-515-4049
kimaya	+1317-727-1772
Lucy	+1250-618-2964
Cason	+1443-956-7479
Chareese Lam	+1617-858-4078
Riya	+1646-326-9831
Michael French	+1347-327-4520
kinza	+1917-682-9180
Amanda	+1516-662-0683
Sophia	+1201-744-8390

↙ Add yourself!